What Happened?

The US equity markets continued to lead the way with the S&P 500 setting a new record for the longest bull market in history (according to some definitions) on August 22nd. A bull market is a sustained period where stocks have increased at least 20% without a decline of 20%. The last time stocks declined at least 20% was in March 2009, which started the current bull run and ended the previous bear market. Possible explanations for why the terms bear and bull are used to describe markets.

¹ This article is from November 2017, it asks if you should do anything differently during a long bull market. The answer: maintain your strategic asset allocation and be prepared to add to equities if they lose value

US and Mexico agree on a NAFTA deal. Canada was not included in the talks, but had a deadline of August 31st to reach an agreement with the US that came and went. Talks will resume September 5th.

European Union to protect firms from US sanctions law

The US would like to implement tariffs on $200 billion worth of goods, as early as September 6th

The US government to pay $4.7 billion in tariff related aid to farmers.

There was an assassination attempt on Venezuela's president using drones

Unemployment in the US is at the lowest levels since the early 2000s

Federal Reserve Chairman, Jerome Powell, indicated that there will be another interest rate hike in September.

To no one's surprise, Donald Trump thinks the market would crash and that "everybody would be very poor if he were impeached." Others think "stocks would soar."

Social media continues to deal with misinformation campaigns leading up to Midterm elections in the US.

August 2018

Google terminated 39 YouTube channels while Facebook deleted 652 accounts, groups, and pages.

The most expensive car ever sold (at auction) went for US$48.4 million. At the same time the Federal Reserve mentions that they are waiting for inflation

I recently experienced the "ikea effect" when I replaced the brakes on my car with the guidance (and tool box) of a friend who knows what he's doing. The ikea effect is related to the endowment effect, which suggests that mere ownership of something increases the value to individuals.

Attended Elora Riverfest for the first time and came across a few acts, I've never seen before (Royal Castles, Cuff the Duke) and a couple I have (Wolf Parade, July Talk)

Also, saw Counting Crows with Live at the Budweiser Stage. It was like travelling back in time. Both bands were great and indistinguishable from their original CDs. Their opening act, Boom Forest, is worth a listen.

Books

"Homo Deus: A Brief History of Tomorrow," Yuval Noah Harari

From the author of, "Sapiens: A Brief History of Humankind," this is a look at the future of humanity. I almost enjoyed this book as much as Sapiens. The future is going to look a lot different and will progress at an increasingly fast pace. The author asks some great questions and provides interesting insights. Part 2 of the book I found a little slow. It went into economic, political, and religious systems; which I have read a lot about recently and consequently found a little boring. Highly recommend reading this book along with its predecessor.

Health

I caught a bug while attending the aforementioned Riverfest. In "Homo Deus" Yuval Harari talks about Google being able to predict flu epidemics days sooner than the medical system if it were able to analyze emails and messages for certain terms to predict if people were sick. Coincidently(?), this video of how to clear your sinuses appeared in my YouTube feed.
